Yes, I've thought about that myself. There was an incident a few years ago when a woman heard her neighbour yelling for help - her husband wasn't breathing or something. So the woman went over, did CPR, and broke a rib. Afterwards, the couple sued the woman for the broken rib. Good gracious, she saved the guy's life!

And police have sometimes warned people that unless you're on duty as a police or ambulance officer, or any emergency specialist, that if you see someone in trouble, don't help them. You could get sued. Just call for the proper emergency people and get out of the area.

They don't advise that all the time, but there are some nasty people out there.
